

Its almost 25 years since Jeffrey Robinson wrote bestselling The Laundrymen. In those heady days of the early 1990s, the United States was cocaine saturated, white power was pouring into the UK, the City of London was a cesspool of dirty money, and nearly $300 billion worth of ill-gotten cash was circling the globe, looking to get clean. Today the US is still cocaine saturated, white powder continues to pour into the UK, and now more than $1 trillion worth of ill-gotten cash is circling the globe, looking to get clean. Where did it all go wrong? Start with the City of London which is, more than ever, a cesspool of dirty money. It started with drug money and is now awash with the receipts of political and corporate corruption. Now throw in what the destruction successive governments have done to British law enforcement and Parliaments proclivity for talking a good game, then doing nearly nothing to prosecute the money launderers. Ripping the scab off Britains dismal record when it comes to dirty money, The New Laundrymen takes readers deep inside the HSBC scandal; all over the Panama Papers (the author was the one who originally outed the Panamanian lawyers Mossack & Fonseca on Channel 4 News with Jon Snow in 1998); to $50 million worth of drug money that sat in a Barclays Private Bank account in London, until it was eventually returned to the money launderer because the Financial Services Authority pretended it didnt know anything about it; explains how British Telecom laundered fraud money (knowingly) for the Italian mob; to the Commonwealth Islands that live off dirty money; sings praises for the one offshore island that decided enough was enough; and reveals why the worlds dictators love London - from Nigerias General Abacha to Egypts Mubarak to Libyas Qaddafi - because their sons were always welcome here to bed down the loot their fathers stole from their national treasuries. Just as he did 25 years ago, Jeffrey points fingers and names names, turning the spotlight on Britains gatekeepers - the lawyers, bankers, accountants, company formation agents and brokers living right here - who continue to make huge profits in the worlds third largest business - money laundering.
